Professional History

Ned is currently studying a Bachelor of Urban and Regional Planning with Honours at the University of South Australia, receiving a university merit award for obtaining a grade point average in the top 15% of students in his division.

Before joining Holmes Dyer, Ned worked in the not-for-profit sector, being a Board Director for the UniSA Students' Association, and President of United Nations Youth SA, which has led him to develop a deep understanding of what it takes to work through strategic projects to achieve great outcomes for the community.

Through his work with the Students' Association, Ned has worked on many improvements to governance procedures and representation, which include writing election regulations and representation reviews. Through his work with the United Nations Youth SA, Ned has been provided with a wealth of experience in community engagement, and he has worked with thousands of people within school and community groups, particularly in South Australia and New South Wales. Ned is also experienced in working with young people in regional communities to provide governments at all levels with an accurate picture of young people in their area, and to encourage young people to become more involved in community issues.

Experience

Ned's primary focus is in the analysis of community and economic data, including from stakeholder consultation, to form a picture of community needs. His work at Holmes Dyer has included service analysis, stakeholder engagement, property market analysis, and working with the Planning and Design Code. He brings a strong social conscience to his work, while retaining the vital understanding of financial necessity. One of Ned's key strengths is in public speaking and verbal communication, with extensive experience in community engagement and presentation.

Ned has worked on an Urban Activation Framework for an industrial precinct, conducting research and stakeholder engagement, as well as the creation of the Framework document. In his work on a major residential land release area, Ned has undertaken property market analysis, and analysed the service requirements for the new development, addressing community, retail, commercial, recreation and educational needs of the incoming population.

Ned has drafted a number of submissions to the consultation process for phase three of the Planning and Design Code Consultation, becoming familiar with the new system and its impacts upon many different facets of planning and development.
